Due to its location the phone box is often used by visitors (walkers, tourists, ramblers) to the area. For its rural location this kiosk has seen much higher usage than others therefore showing the continued need for it to remain operational. Object received from Sir Edward Leigh – A BT land-line telephone service for public use is necessary in Stainton le Vale because of the extremely poor, and at times non-existent Broadband service in and around the locality. The use of the public land-line service when mobile signals are regularly | |

Elderly residents particularly in the area are comforted knowing this telephone services is available moreover they know it is reliable when other telephone connections fail. The service is also extremely useful to visitors to the area not only to make call but also as a landmark where they might otherwise find themselves lost without a mobile signal. The argument that the telephone service is not used often to warrant its removal is poor as the service is indeed used. You will agree, most emergency alarms/services are not frequently used, yet are necessary if one day it might be needed to save a life of help somebody in distress or need. Keeping the land line in-situ supports and protects this | |
